

Leading Sales in Changing Times™

Leading Sales in Changing Times™ is a collaborative learning experience designed specifically to help the leadership of your sales organization to more effectively and efficiently manage the myriad of issues that face those in one of the most critical roles in the company during times of change – the revenue producers.

Leading Sales in Changing Times takes the position that while change happens continually throughout our organizations, change in the sales organization is different. Today, the amount of focus and discretionary energy required of a person to effectively compete in the age of the self-educated customer, who is halfway down their decision path before they meet with your sales team, is at an all-time high.

Simply put, sales people and teams who are themselves distracted and struggling their way through change do not have the energy available to them that is required to impact the customer's point of view and then attach that new perspective to the unique advantages of your solutions.

The staggering costs and failure rates associated with major change initiatives are well known. But why? It is not that the designers weren't smart enough. The programs are often built and managed by some of the most advanced minds in the organization. It is not that the planning efforts were wrong or insufficiently monitored. Today these programs are controlled in minute detail and closely managed with advanced analytics and tools that report their performance in real time to company management.

In Leading Sales in Changing Times, sales leaders consider that the root cause of most change management problems lies in the fact that the human experience with and response to the changes are often ignored, and sometimes even punished, and the possibility that many of the strategies we use to try to accelerate change are sometimes the very factors that slow us down.

To succeed, sales organizations must be agile and need to accelerate through the implementation of multiple strategy changes in a given year and perform at the same time. At the very time when rapid strategic change requires sales people to focus and be at their best, increasing demands may cause their energy to disperse and/or be consumed in unproductive ways. In other words, when the company needs the sales organizations at their best, we are often at our worst.

OUTCOMES

Following their participation in the Leading Sales in Changing Times session, your sales leaders will:

Develop an understanding of some of the reasons why change management efforts often fall short of their mark all together

Understand the range of natural, normal human responses to change

Appreciate the distinction between change and transition

Learn the 3 processes that people need to progress through in their own transitions.

Understand that different team members land in different places and sales leadership's job is to help them through the transitions efficiently and engage the new beginnings

Develop new strategies and tactics for helping your own sales team members manage through their current and upcoming transitions

Work together on real, current, and important upcoming changes in your organization and develop specific recommendations for leading the teams more effectively through them.

Leading Sales in Changing Times™ is a collaborative learning experience that helps your sales leaders become more deliberately proactive and more effective leaders of their teams through even the most disruptive of times in your organization.

Participants learn these skills first by applying the insights to personal changes and career transitions of their own, and only then are asked to apply them to the individuals on their own sales teams, and to the organizational changes that are the most important for you to manage successfully.

Program Summary

Leading Sales in Changing Times is a one-day working session designed to help sales managers and leaders at all levels gain insights into what hinders their ability to drive rapid changes through their organizations, the insights and analytical tools to assess what is holding their people back, and the skills to help their people move on, to re-engage and get back to successfully competing in the face of the new reality.

Prior to the session, sales leadership identifies a small number of current and upcoming changes that they believe will be most challenging to the sales organization. Participants in the session are assigned to small working teams who will work on developing the strategies and tactics to better manage through these critical transitions.

At the very time when rapid strategic change requires sales people to focus and be at their best, increasing demands and confusing messages may cause their energy to disperse and/or be consumed in unproductive ways. In other words, when the company needs the sales organization to be at their best, they are often at their worst.

The chances that a change in strategy directly impacts the sales team, perhaps even disrupts the team, are likely close to 100% in any given period. Sales leaders need to be world-class at moving their people through their transitions and engaging successfully in the new reality.
